

GOOGLE turns out to be the biggest promoter of BREXIT as punishment to EU for investigations

No matter which candidate gets your vote in the upcoming presidential election, the world's most valuable tech company will not be standing behind you...or so they say in order to avoid a Congressional investigation. One thing is for sure though, Google Is the largest promoter of the European BREXIT campaign to break-up the European Union.

Google has hired more lobbyists and politicians and put more money into breaking up the EU, than any other entity. Why? Because the EU called Google out for rigging internet search results.

Google “says” it will not lend its support to either Hillary Clinton or Donald Trump, according to company's executive chairman Eric Schmidt. "We have not taken a position on the American election and nor do I expect us to," said the longtime Googler, speaking at Startup Grind in London on Wednesday. Few seem to believe Google, though.

Google might be how much of the world gets its information about politics these days, but it is not immune to accusations of political bias. Schmidt has previously been described as a "kind of guru" to President Barack Obama's campaign manager, and Google employees were found to be the No. 2 donor to the Democratic National Committee at the last election. But Google has been careful to ensure the company itself does not openly affiliate itself with one political party.

Trump is proving to be an incredibly divisive Republican candidate, to the extent that Buzzfeed turned away a $1.3 million advertising deal with the Republican National Convention. If Google was going to publicly align itself to the Democrats, or distance itself from the Republicans, now would probably be the moment.

Thanks to Schmidt's declaration, we know it won't, but that doesn't mean that Clinton won't receive similar support as her predecessors from Google employees on an individual basis or total support in a covert mood manipulation manner by Google.
